7. [From galla.]

Galls or galnuts are preternatural and accidental tumours, produced on trees; but thoſe of the oak only are uſed in medicine. We have Oriental and European galls: the Oriental are brought from Aleppo, of the bigneſs of a large nutmeg, with tubercles on their ſurface, of a very firm texture, and a diſagreeable, acerb, and aſtringent taſte. The European galls are of the ſame ſize, with perfectly ſmooth ſurfaces: they are light, often ſpongy, and cavernous within, and always of a lax texture. They have a leſs auſtere taſte, and are of much leſs value than the firſt ſort. The general hiſtory of galls is this: An inſect of the fly kind wounds the branches of the trees, and in the hole depoſites her egg; the lacerated veſſels of the tree diſcharging their contents, form a tumour or woody caſe about the hole, where the egg is thus defended from all injuries. This tumour alſo ſerves for the food of the tender maggot, produced from the egg, which, as ſoon as it is in its winged ſtate, gnaws its way out, as appears from the hole found in the gall; and where no hole is ſeen, the maggot, or its remains, are ſure to be found within. It has been obſerved, that the oak does not produce galls in cold countries: but this obſervation ſhall be confined to the medicinal galls; for all thoſe excreſcencies which we call oak-apples, oak-grapes, and oak-cones, are true galls, though leſs firm in their texture. Hill.

Beſides the acorns, the oak beareth galls, oak-apples, and oak-nuts. Bacon's Natural Hiſtory.

Malpighi, in his treatiſe of galls, under which name he comprehends all preternatural and morboſe excreſcences, demonſtrates that all ſuch excreſcences, where any inſects are found, are excited by ſome venenoſe liquor, which, together with their eggs, ſuch inſects ſhed. Ray on the Creation.

I.

I, IS in Engliſh conſidered both as a vowel and conſonant; though, ſince the vowel and conſonant differ in their form as well as ſound, they may be more properly accounted two letters.

I vowel has a long ſound, as me, thine, which is uſually marked with an e final; and a ſhort ſound, as fin, thin Prefixed to e it makes a diphthong of the ſame ſound with the ſoft i, or double e, ee: thus field, yield, are ſpoken as feeld, yeeld; except friend, which is ſpoken frend. Subjoined to a or e it makes them long, as fail, neigh; and to o makes a mingled ſound, which approaches more nearly to the true notion of a diphthong, or ſound compoſed of the ſounds of two vowels, than any other combination of vowels in the Engliſh language, as oil, coin. The ſound of i before another i, and at the end of a word is always expreſſed by y.

J conſonant has invariably the ſame ſound with that of g in giant, as jade, jet, jilt, jolt, juſt.

Inarching is a method of grafting, which is commonly called grafting by approach. This method of grafting is uſed when the ſtock and the tree may be joined: take the branch you would inarch, and, having fitted it to that part of the ſtock where you intend to join it, pare away the rind and wood on one ſide about three inches in length: after the ſame manner cut the ſtock or branch in the place where the graft is to be united, ſo that they may join equally together that the ſap may meet: then cut a little tongue upwards in the graft, and make a notch in the ſtock to admit it; ſo that when they are joined the tongue will prevent their ſlipping, and the graft will more cloſely unite with the ſtock. Having thus placed them exactly together, tie them; then cover the place with grafting clay, to prevent the air from entering to dry the wound, or the wet from getting in to rot the ſtock: you ſhould fix a ſtake into the ground, to which that part of the ſtock, as alſo the graft, ſhould be faſtened, to prevent the wind from breaking them aſunder. In this manner they are to remain about four months, in which time they will be ſufficiently united; and the graft may then be cut from the mother-tree, obſerving to ſlope it off cloſe to the ſtock, and cover the joined parts with freſh grafting clay. The operation is always performed in April or May, and is commonly practiſed upon oranges, myrtles, jaſmines, walnuts, firs, and pines, which will not ſucceed by common grafting or budding. Miller.

Ju′ry, dzhỏ′-rỷ. n. ſ. [jurata, Lat. juré, Fr.]

Jury, a company of men, as twenty-four or twelve, ſworn to deliver a truth upon ſuch evidence as ſhall be delivered them touching the matter in queſtion. There be three manners of trials in England: one by parliament, another by battle, and the third by aſſize or jury. The trial by aſſize, be the action civil or criminal, publick or private, perſonal or real, is referred for the fact to a jury, and as they find it, ſo paſſeth the judgment. This jury is uſed not only in circuits of juſtices errant, but alſo in other courts, and matters of office, as, if the eſcheatour make inquiſition in any thing touching his office, he doth it by a jury of inqueſt: if the coroner inquire how a ſubject found dead came to his end, he uſeth an inqueſt: the juſtices of peace in their quarter-ſeſſions, the ſheriff in his county and turn, the bailiff of a hundred, the ſteward of a court-leet or court-baron, if they inquire of any offence, or decide any cauſe between party and party, they do it by the ſame manner: ſo that where it is ſaid, that all things be triable by parliament, battle, or aſſize; aſſize, in this place, is taken for a jury or inqueſt, empanelled upon any cauſe in a court where this kind of trial is uſed. This jury, though it appertain to moſt courts of the common law, yet it is moſt notorious in the half-year courts of the juſtices errants, commonly called the great aſſizes, and in the quarter-ſeſſions, and in them it is moſt ordinarily called a jury, and that in civil cauſes; whereas in other courts it is often termed an inqueſt. In the general aſſize, there are uſually many juries, becauſe there be ſtore of cauſes, both civil and criminal, commonly to be tried, whereof one is called the grand jury, and the reſt petit juries. The grand jury conſiſts ordinarily of twenty-four grave and ſubſtantial gentlemen, or ſome of them yeomen, choſen indifferently out of the whole ſhire by the ſheriff, to conſider of all bills of indictment preferred to the court; which they do either approve by writing upon them theſe words, billa vera, or diſallow by writing ignoramus. Such as they do approve, if they touch life and death, are farther referred to another jury to be conſidered of, becauſe the caſe is of ſuch importance; but others of lighter moment are, upon their allowance, without more work, fined by the bench, except the party traverſe the indictment, or challenge it for inſufficiency, or remove the cauſe to a higher court by certiorari; in which two former caſes it is referred to another jury, and in the latter tranſmitted to the higher. Thoſe that paſs upon civil cauſes real, are all, or ſo many as can conveniently be had, of the ſame hundred where the land or tenement in queſtion doth lie, and four at the leaſt; and they, upon due examination, bring in their verdict either for the demandant or tenant: according unto which, judgment paſſeth afterward in the court where the cauſe firſt began; and the reaſon hereof is, becauſe theſe juſtices of aſſize are, in this caſe, for the eaſe of the country, only to take the verdict of the jury by virtue of the writ called niſi prius, and ſo return it to the court where the cauſe is depending. Cowell.

The jury, paſſing on the priſoner's life,

O that I were judge, I would do juſtice. 2 Sam.

The king-becoming graces,
As juſtice, verity, temp'rance, ſtableneſs,
I have no reliſh of them. Shakeſp. Macbeth.

The nature and office of juſtice being to diſpoſe the mind to a conſtant and perpetual readineſs to render to every man his due, it is evident, that if gratitude be a part of juſtice, it muſt be converſant about ſomething that is due to another. Locke.

2. Equity; agreeableneſs to right: as, he proved the juſtice of his claim.

3. Vindicative retribution; puniſhment; oppoſed to mercy.

4. Right; aſſertion of right.

Draw thy ſword,
That if my ſpeech offend a noble heart,
Thy arm may do thee juſtice. Shakeſp. King Lear.

5. [Juſticiarius, Lat.] One deputed by the king to do right by way of judgment. Cowell.

And thou, Eſdras, ordain judges and juſtices, that they may judge in all Syria. 1 Eſdras.

6. Juſtice of the King's Bench. [juſticiarius de Banquo Regis.] Is a lord by his office, and the chief of the reſt; wherefore he is alſo called capitalis juſticiarius Angliæ. His office eſpecially is to hear and determine all pleas of the crown; that is, ſuch as concern offences committed againſt the crown, dignity, and peace of the king; as treaſons, felonies, mayhems, and ſuch like: but it is come to paſs, that he with his aſſiſtants heareth all perſonal actions, and real alſo, if they be incident to any perſonal action depending before them. Cowell.

Give that whipſter his errand,
He'll take my lord chief juſtice' warrant. Prior.

7. Juſtice of the Common Pleas. [juſticiarius Communium Placitorum.] Is a lord by his office, and is called dominus juſticiarius communium placitorum. He with his aſſiſtants originally did hear and determine all cauſes at the common law; that is, all civil cauſes between common perſons, as well perſonal as real; for which cauſe it was called the court of common pleas, in oppoſition to the pleas of the crown, or the king's pleas, which are ſpecial, and appertaining to him only. Cowell.

8. Juſtice of the Foreſt. [juſticiarius Foreſtæ.] Is a lord by his office, and hath the hearing and determining of all offences within the king's foreſt, committed againſt veniſon or vert: of theſe there be two, whereof the one hath juriſdiction over all the foreſts on this ſide Trent, and the other of all beyond. Cowell.

9. Juſtices of Aſſiſe. [juſticiarii ad capiendas Aſſiſas.] Are ſuch as were wont, by ſpecial commiſſion, to be ſent into this or that country to take aſſiſes; the ground of which polity was the eaſe of the ſubjects: for whereas theſe actions paſs always by jury, ſo many men might not, without great hinderance, be brought to London; and therefore juſtices, for this purpoſe, were by commiſſion particularly authoriſed and ſent down to them. Cowell.

10. Juſtices in Eyre. [juſticiarii itinerantes.] Are ſo termed of the French erre, iter. The uſe of theſe, in ancient time, was to ſend them with commiſſion into divers counties, to hear ſuch cauſes eſpecially as were termed the pleas of the crown, and therefore I muſt imagine they were ſent abroad for the eaſe of the ſubjects, who muſt elſe have been hurried to the King's Bench, if the cauſe were too high for the country court. They differed from the juſtices of Oyer and Terminer, becauſe they were ſent upon ſome one or few eſpecial caſes, and to one place; whereas the juſtices in eyre were ſent through the provinces and countries of the land, with more indefinite and general commiſſion. Cowell.

11. Juſtices of Gaol Delivery. [juſticiarii ad Gaolas deliberandas.] Are ſuch as are ſent with commiſſion to hear and determine all cauſes appertaining to ſuch as for any offence are caſt into gaol, part of whoſe authority is to puniſh ſuch as let to mainpriſe thoſe priſoners that by law be not bailable. Theſe by likelihood, in ancient time, were ſent to countries upon ſeveral occaſions; but afterward juſtices of aſſiſe were likewiſe authoriſed to this. Cowell.

12. Juſtices of Niſi Prius are all one now-a-days with juſtices of aſſiſe; for it is a common adjournment of a cauſe, in the common pleas, to put it off to ſuch a day: niſi prius juſticiarii venerint ad eas partes ad capiendas aſſiſas; and upon this clauſe of adjournment they are called juſtices of niſi prius, as well as juſtices of aſſiſe, by reaſon of the writ or action that they have to deal in. Cowell.

13. Juſtices of Peace. [juſticiarii ad Pacem.] Are they that are appointed by the king's commiſſion, with others, to attend the peace of the country where they dwell; of whom ſome, upon eſpecial reſpect, are made of the quorum, becauſe ſome buſineſs of importance may not be dealt in without the preſence of them, or one of them. Cowell.

The juſtice,
In fair round belly with good capon lin'd,
With eyes ſevere, and beard of formal cut,
Full of wiſe ſaws and modern inſtances,
And ſo he plays his part. Shakeſp. As you like it.

Thou haſt appointed juſtices of the peace to call poor men before them, about matters they were not able to anſwer. Shakeſp.

The juſtices of peace are of great uſe; anciently they were conſervators of the peace; theſe are the ſame, ſaving that ſeveral acts of parliament have enlarged their juriſdiction. Bacon.
